Minute By the Auditors as to Road Levy

For 1898 a 6 mill Road Tax was levied. This was said to be needed in part for new road. Now the new roads at Tyler and Hickory have been opened The new road on Mountain Run has been opened as far as there are settlers. The remainder of that road might wait till Sandy Twp. people move to open the upper end.

It appears to us that a much less rate of tax levy for 1899 on the valuation of $547.000 will keep the roads in repair and do what is essential on the Mountain Run road. L. Bird, W. W. Hoover, A. H. Rosenkrans, Auditors.

OLD LETTERS.

The house was silent, and the light
Was fading from the western glow;
I read, till tears had dimmed my sight,
Some letters written long ago.

The voices that have passed away,
The faces that have turned to mold,
Were round me in the room to-day
And laughed and chatted as of old.

The thoughts that youth was wont to think,
The hopes now dead forevermore,
Came from the lines of faded ink
As sweet and earnest as of yore.

I laid the letters by and dreamed
The dear dead past to life again;
The present and its purpose seemed
A fading vision full of pain.

Then, with a sudden shout of glee,
The children burst into the room,
Their little faces were to me
As sunrise in the cloud of gloom.

The world was full of meaning still,
For love will live though loved ones die;
I turned upon life's darkened hill
And gloried in the morning sky.

—Frederick George Scott, in Boston Transcript.

HOW THE CAPTAIN FOUND HIS BOY.

WHEN the Flying Scud discharged her cargo and passengers at the London dock, there landed among them a gentleman who had been absent from England for nine years. All that while he had passed under the burning suns of India. He had suffered as soldiers do. He had fought as soldiers fight. He had met the soldier's fate of scars and wounds, and one of them had invalided him home to England.

It was the first time he had trod her shores for nine years, as we have said, and for the first time in any year he was going to see his son, the little boy born after he left home, and whose birth had been his mother's death.

Captain Penran had only been married a year when he was ordered abroad with his regiment. Six months from that day a letter had reached him telling him his wife was dead. The letter was written by an old nurse, the only friend who had been with her. It ended thus:

"The baby, a fine a child as I ever saw, is thriving, I've done my best for it. Its mother's last wish was as I should keep it, and perhaps, sir, as some one must, you'd as leave I as any other. I shan't be unreasonable in my charges, and I'm very fond of him already.

"With my duty to you in this dreadful trouble, your servant,

"ANN GOLDEN."

The poor, broken-hearted man almost sank under the awful news. He had loved his wife passionately, and when the baby was old enough to travel she would have come to him in India, braving its terrible climate and the life of a soldier's wife abroad, because they could not live apart. Now he did not want a little baby on his hands, and he wrote to Ann as soon as he could command himself to do so, appointing her as its nurse.

Every quarter since that time he had sent money to her for the child's board and clothes. A receipt was always returned with "her duty, and the young gentleman was doing well," and this was all he knew of his Ellen's boy—the child of love that had been as strong as it was tender.

Now that his foot was upon England's shores again, and the meeting was very near, Captain Penran felt new thrills of father-love through his soldier's heart and long for his boy's presence.

"He would take him to himself," he said. "They would live together, sharing each other's joys and sorrows. He would make a man of the boy—not a soldier, for he knew the trials of a soldier's life too well; but something very honorable and creditable. He should be proud of him, and he hoped—ah, how he hoped!—that Ellen's child would have Ellen's face.

"My beautiful girl," he said to himself, with the tears standing in his eyes, "how little I thought of this hour when I kissed her good-by!"

And then his heart grew even warmer to the pledge of their mutual love.

He had the address that Mrs. Golden had given him in his pocket. He glanced as it now to freshen his memory as to the number. A plain, respectable street in one of London's suburbs; he remembered it well.

"But my boy shall see better things, now that I am here," he said to himself. "I am not rich, but I can deny myself to make him happy. Will he love me, I wonder?"

Then he thought how his own heart had been won by toys and sweatmeats, and coming to a store where the former were sold, paused before the gay window, and began to make a mental choice between a red and gilt stage-coach and horses, and a train of blue steam cars. He had discarded both for a box of scarlet-coated soldiers, when suddenly he felt a tug at his coat tail, and turning suddenly, found a grimy little hand half in, half out, of his pocket. He caught it at once with his handkerchief in it, and gripped it tight.

He was a soldier, and to a soldier the keeping of law and rule is a great thing. To give the little thief to a policeman, and appear against him next day, was his first thought; but as the creature stood there shaking and whinning, the fact of his diminutive size struck the captain forcibly. He realized his youth, which was extreme, and he saw that, besides being young and small, and wan and dirty, and ragged, he was deformed. His queer little shoulders were heaped up to his ears, and his hands were like talons, so long and bony were they. The captain held the wrist of this manikin firmly still, but not angrily.

"What did you mean by that, sir?" he growled slowly, stooping down to look into the boy's eyes.

"I'm to hook it," said the boy, with perfect candor. "Oh. please, leave me be? Oh, please, sir, lem me go? Oh, please, sir, I won't do it no more—never, oh, please!"

"I've a mind to have you sent to jail," said the captain.

"No, please, sir," said the waif. "Please, sir."

"Who taught you to steal?" asked the captain. The boy made no answer. Grimy tears were pouring from his eyes.

"Answer me," said the captain.

"If I don't I don't get no victuals," said the boy, "an' my stomach is as holler. Feel of it, mister? It's as holler as a drum. She's been a beggin' to-day and we'll have stew. I won't have none if I don't fetch nothin'. Oh——"

"Who is she?" asked the captain.

"Me mother," said the boy.

"I've been hungry myself," said the captain, thinking of a certain Indian prison experience. "It isn't pleasant."

Then he thought of his boy.

"God knows I ought to be tender to the little ones, for the sake of Nellie's child," he said softly; then aloud:

"Laddie, I'll not send you to prison."

"Thankee, sir," said the urchin.

"And I'll give you a breakfast," said the captain.

The dirty elf executed a sort of joyous war dance.

"Do you know why I forgive you?" said the captain. The child shook his head.

"I have a little boy," said the captain. "He's very different from you, poor child. He would not steal anything. He washes himself. My lad, you must wash yourself as soon as you find water. But I couldn't bear to think of his being hungry, and for his sake I can't bear to see other little fellows hungry. It's for his sake that I don't call an officer and tell him all about it. Remember that, and try to be like—like my little fellow, poor laddie, clean and good. Don't steal; try to get work. Will you promise?"

The waif said, "Yes, sir," of course.

Then the captain led him into a cheap eating-saloon and watched him eat until his stomach was no longer "holler."

"You little wretch," he thought, as he looked at him! "If I could see my boy and him together now, what a contrast!" And he fancied his boy round and white and pink, and fair of hair, like his poor lost Ellen, and I know he said that he would pity this poor fellow and be kind to him.

The meal was over. The captain paid for it, and then drew the boy between his knees and lectured him. To be good was to be happy. Honesty was the best policy. Cleanliness came next to godliness. These were the heads of his discourse.

Then he gave him half a crown, and bade him go and be good and clean, in God's name.

And the boy was off like a flash.

"Thousands just such as he are in this great city!" sighed the good captain, as he walked along. "Ah, he?"

Then he went in search of Mrs. Ann Golden and his own fair darling.

But Mrs. Golden was not so easily found as he had hoped. There was a little shop in the house he had been directed to, and the keeper thereof said that she had bought it of Ann Golden; but I haven't seen her since, she said; only there's a bit of card with her number on it—that is, if I can find it. After a search she did find it. And the captain, thanking her, hurried away; but another disappointment awaited him.

Mrs. Golden had not lived in this second place for several years. She had moved into —— row, but what number no one could remember.

At —— row, whither the captain drove in a hackney coach, a woman owned to having had her for a lodger. "She had a child staying with her, too," she said. "Little Ned, she called him, but, to tell the truth, she drank so that I warned her out. I couldn't abide such doing. She went to Chancey's lane, number nine."

To Chancey's lane the captain went. It was a filthy place, and there was a drunken woman at number nine who was not Ann Golden, and who threw a stick of wood at him for asking for that lady. And now every clew was lost, and the captain nearly beside himself with anxiety, applied to the authorities for help, and, after many days of great unhappiness, heard of an Ann Golden who lived in a quarter of London so low and dangerous that all decent people shunned it.

"No wonder," the captain thought, "if she lived there that she should have had his remittances sent to the postoffice, and left him to believe that his child was still in the decent home to which she had at first taken him."

Almost ill with excitement, the poor captain drove, with a policeman as protector, into the maze of hideous lanes and courts that led to Ann Golden's dwelling, and, following his conductor, dropped into a filthy cellar, where, amid the horrible leakage of drain-pipes and almost in utter darkness, sat an old woman with a bottle beside her, who started up when the captain and his guard entered and cried:

"What now? What's the perlice here for? Is it one of the boys again?"

And, altered as she was with years and drink, the captain knew his wife's old nurse, Ann Golden. He gave a howl of rage and darted toward her.

"My boy!" he cried.

And she screamed, "It's the captain!"

"Is my boy living?" he asked.

"Yes," said the woman, shaking; "he's alive and well."

"How dare you keep him here?" cried the captain.

"How can I help being poor?" whined the woman. "I couldn't give up the bit you pay for him. I'm very old; I'm very ill. Don't be hard on me."

"My God!" cried the capta[illegible] Ellen's baby in a place like thi[illegible]

"I could do it!" cried the captain. "Listen! There is someone coming. My child! my child!"

The door opened softly, a head peeped in low down, then drew back.

"Come in," piped the old woman. "The police arn't after you—leastways for harm. Captain, that's him—you[illegible] boy Ned."

And as the cap[illegible] stood with stretched arms, th[illegible] crept in at [illegible] door—who? what? the wan, defor[illegible] and dirty creature who had picked [illegible] pocket—whom he had fed for the [illegible] of his beautiful dream-child [illegible] wretched waif, forgotten utterly [illegible] last few days of anxiety.

"That's him," croaked th[illegible] crone again. "That's your boy [illegible] Ned."

The captain gave a cry; h[illegible] down on an old box close [illegible] and hid his face and wept. [illegible] shook him horribly; they almost [illegible] the crazy building. They frighten[illegible] the old woman, and set the policeman to rubbing his eyes with his cuffs. The boy stood and stared for a moment and then vanished.

And what was the wretched father thinking? So many thoughts that there are no words for them; but, first of all, this horrible one; that that vile little object, that wretched child of the street, was the darling for whom he had searched so long.

"Better I had never found him," moaned the captain, "or fo[illegible] find him dead!"

And just then a little [illegible] over his knee. The thrill [illegible] against his hand, and a, p[illegible] [illegible]ept said, meekly:

"Please, I'm clean now. I'[illegible] washe[illegible] me."

The captain's swollen eyes unclosed. They turned upon the child.

Some queer knowledge of his father's feelings had crept into his mind, and he had tried to clean his face. A round white spot appeared amid the grime, and out of it shone two beautiful blue eyes that looked wistfully up into the captain's.

All of a sudden a flood of such pitiful tenderness as he had never felt before swept over Captain Penran's heart. All the grief and shame and wounded pride left it to come back no more.

"Ellen's eyes!" he sobbed. "Ellen's boy!" and took his son to his heart. "For his sake," he said, softly, as though he stood by the grave of the beautiful dream-child he had just buried, "for his sake and Ellen's!"

And then he led the child away with him.

The Harrier.

The harrier has been described as originating in a double cross between the small beagle, the Southern hound and the dwarf foxhound. That is an assertion which at the present time is hard to dispute. The true origin of most of our hunting hounds is so lost in obscurity, and the crosses by which perfection in hound types has been obtained have been so many and so various, that it is a matter of impossibility to assign an exact origin to what is called the old English harrier. In the last century, before hunting had attained the form and exactness which it now exhibits, country gentlemen who delighted in the chase usually maintained a few couples of different hounds for the various forms of chase. Thus William Somerville, the author of that excellent poem, "The Chase," an enthusiastic sportsman, kept about twelve couples of beagles "bred chiefly between the Cotswold harrier and the Southern hound; six couples of foxhounds, rather rough and wire-haired, and five couples of otter hounds, which in the winter season made an addition to the foxhounds."—Saturday Review.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

DOCTOR TOO LATE.

The Mosquito Had Saved the Snake-Bitten Man—An Ague Cure.

New York Press: "Talkin' about rattlesnakes," said an Erie railroad brakeman, "did you ever hear how the mosquitoes saved a man's life up near Gulf Summit last summer? Well, while getting out railroad ties in a slashin' over back of the Summit, Abe Morehouse was bitten in the leg by a rattlesnake. A Susquehanna doctor was at once sent for and the leg was bandaged tightly above the wound. It was expected that Morehouse would die before the doctor could come up the pike on his bike. Just as soon as the leg was bared to put on the bandage it was attacked by a swarm of mosquitoes, and when the doctor arrived he found the man as lively as a cricket and in no need of a doctor, but the ground was covered with dead and dying mosquitoes. They had sucked the poison from the wound and saved Morehouse's life. The mosquitoes presented their bills and died. The doctor presented his bill and got his money. This was hard on the mosquitoes, but I presume Morehouse's life was worth savin'. There was Sol Timson, another brakeman. Sol used to brake on the Delaware division, from Susquehanna to Port Jervis. He had the ague awfully. Had it so bad that some of his teeth shook out, and he shook the buttons off his coat. A lot of his friends had sure cures for the ague, and each gave him the prescription. At last when he had 13 prescriptions, he took them all to a Port Jervis drug store and had them put up. He took them home and put them all into one jug. Then he shook the jug, mixed the 13 prescriptions thoroughly, and took three doses. He never shook again until the hearse struck a stone."

To Make Divorce Easy.

Lithuania, a province of Russia, has a strange custom, which is intended to protect the bride, should her marriage prove unhappy. Previous to the wedding ceremony the mother, in the presence of witnesses, severely boxes the bride's ears. As time goes by should the benedict prove faithless or unkind, his vrow can sue for a divorce on the plea that she was forced into the marriage by her mother against her will, and on that score the verdict of the judge will be in her favor.

An Excellent Combination.

Any Girl Can Tell

A physician who makes the test and is honest about it can tell you that, in many cases, the number of red corpuscles in the blood is doubled after a course of treatment with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

That this means good blood may not be entirely clear from the doctor's statement, but any girl who has tried the pills can tell you that it means red lips, bright eyes, good appetite, absence of headache, and that it transforms the pale and sallow girl into a maiden who glows with the beauty which perfect health alone can give.

Mothers whose daughters grow debilitated as they pass from girlhood into womanhood should not neglect the pill best adapted for this particular ill.

Frank B. Trout, of 103 Griswold Ave., Detroit, Mich., says: "At the age of fourteen we had to take our daughter from school on account of ill health. She weighed only 90 pounds, was pale and sallow and the doctors said she had anæmia. Finally we gave her Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. When she had taken two boxes she was strong enough to leave her bed, and in less than six months was something like herself. To-day she is entirely cured, and is a big, strong, healthy girl, weighing 130 pounds, and has never had a sick day since."—Detroit Evening News.

The genuine Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are sold only in packages, the wrapper always bearing the full name. At all druggists, or direct from the Dr Williams Medicine Co. Schenectady, N.Y. 50¢ per box.
